One of the most difficult experiences you can go through as a man is coming to terms with the fact that you've been alone for years and no longer have your last remaining shred of hope. You spent hours searching for your perfect woman and finding nothing, which, as hard as it is to admit, has probably led to numerous online dating sites on both sides of whatever gender line you're thinking about. But don't worry about settling on one particular site; due to their sheer volume and variety, chances are there's at least one on here that's up your alley (or wherever). So let's take a look at some of the most popular online dating sites in order to help you find what you've been looking for! Bumble Do women just not like men who aren't romantically interested in them? If that's the case than Bumble is probably the last site on the Internet that anyone would be able to say they'd ever want to join. On Bumble, women are required to message guys first in order to recommend them! Once there are at least two prospective matches, one girl has to make the first move. And once a match is made, both parties have 24 hours to decide whether or not they want to continue communication. If no one decides to keep talking, it's all over, which is nice because it prevents guys from creeping on women they don't really have a chance with. You've probably noticed that most online dating sites have a sort of "look" about them, and that's exactly what Bumble has going for it. It seems to be made exclusively for women of a certain age—and a certain body type—with a new username being created every 2 seconds! With no filters available, it already looks like the odds are in your favor when you sign up. Zoosk Zoosk is one of the most popular dating websites in the world and was actually one of the first free dating sites ever released. They've even gone on to garner the title of "the fastest growing online dating site" in the world. Basically, if you're looking for someone who's at least moderately attractive, you're probably going to find them on Zoosk. It isn't too hard to tell why it's so popular, either. They have a sort of interesting approach when it comes to matching people up with potential partners—you have to answer a set of questions in order for Zoosk to figure out who you'd be compatible with. After your initial profile is created based on your answers, it will work its magic and show you people that are compatible with you in one way or another. OKCupid OKCupid is another one of those dating sites that's pretty much guaranteed to be attractive to at least a handful of different types of people. You can sort through basically any criteria you'd like, and no matter what you pick there'll be someone on the site who will be compatible with whatever it is you're looking for. Again, it's all based on what you choose to put in your profile—so if the girl you're looking for is more into guys who have a lot going on in their life rather than just a lot of social media followers, OKCupid can't help you.
